Ashes in the Grate
Selected poems by Dale Alan Bailes
Dale Alan Bailes

Writer-In-Residence for the South Carolina Arts Commission's Artists-In-The-Prisons Program, 1983

My appreciation is extended to the editors and publishers of Apostrophe, Arx, Mississippi Review, St. Andrews Review, and Sandlapper, in which some of these poems were first published.

Cover Photo: Robyn Sherman

© 1983 Dale Alan Bailes
Silence. Ashes in the grate. Whatever it is that keeps us from heaven, sloth, wrath, greed, fear, could we only reinvent it on earth as song.

—Galway Kinnel
"Last Songs"
from Body Rags

© 1968, Houghton Mifflin Co.
(used by permission)
The Jester

The jester on your wall grins at you. His hand has been, will be poised to pluck the lute.

You pull yourself from sleep or death, recall some sound that scared you to this fading point where sleep and death are one and come or don’t come as your left eye struggles open and your right eye simply won’t.

He has waited while you slept while you crept through the other room of the dream and out. He has grinned as a black cat crossed the street to avoid crossing your path, as ladders crashed around you that you wanted to walk under.

He will watch you tumble from the bed, return from all that pain awake, stumble to another room to wet your trembling hands. His hands will tense, prepare to play the chord to match the sound your pleading eyes will make, as you watch the mirror drop you and you shatter.
To Barbara, at her Potter's Wheel
I am jealous of your craft.
Intent, you kick the wheel to spin the shaft
that turns the head and mold the clay to shape your new creation.

Those quick hands
molded subtler clay
a while ago.
Long hair you loosed then for me falls in the way of clay and wheel and vision.

Eager to share all our worlds
I gather back your hair again stuff it down your smock and wait.

You notice only the absence of annoyance and do not feel the yearning touch.

Much relieved, you kick
the wheel again
and so I am set spinning.
Full Moon
Last night I crucified a vampire, silver-bulleted a werewolf, and shook the hand of Frankenstein while in my back yard a clotheslined sheet quietly went on ghosting.
The Trick

Thinking of you in terms of two-over-light was easier. That way you shared my morning rite and left me to idle pleasure of my day. Now, having seen you trundle from a lonely man-filled bar your shoulders slouched against the weight of darkness I know you more than I care to; know your crumpled single bed and barren room; know why your ten-hour-day is comfort to you. Now instead of leaving me to my own tight rare existence you take me trembling with you into your lonely night.
The Drunken Prospector

There was gold all around last night
I saw it. The leaves held gleams too swell to be mere fool’s gold and heavily resisted evening wind.

On water was a shimmering path a mule could almost walk on with pack and tools and me to boot.

I allowed that Midas must have fled this way when his wealth exceeded pleasure. I stepped off measures there to mark my meager claim, then danced and fell down laughing to my sleep.

An ill-made move; for as I slept marauders crept in silently and stole my treasure...Oh, Stranger!

Judge me not insane; the gold is there for having if you take the proper road. Come with me then, provide us with a stake, and gather courage together we may find the Mother Lode.

Ki Haiku
I cannot be a star
shining through the night?
All right then—a firefly!

After the thunderstorm, silence leaves scull playfully
the tranquil stream

Caution, eager heart;
one flower petal-proud
so little proof of spring

Chattering birds celebrate my soul, sweet flower blossoms everywhere
Sharks While Swimming

Lore would have him master of that realm, where helmsmen mates, and feckless hands tell of his feral foraging. An arm, a leg; once half a man was seen to disappear to jaws he never felt. A shark while swimming knows nothing of this legend. Blood smelt and tasted is his only knowledge. Dumb to dawns and sunsets, he serves his chattledom with fierce devotion. Some sound, some thrashing motion, will call the million years of now into his body. Strike! Circle...

Strike! And still the moment’s meal will bring no rest. A shark while swimming must seek protective waters, dark and plankton fested. There, fugitive from his own death he takes what liesure he will ever know.

Threading, threading endlessly through sleepless depths, crude toil drives this shore-starved Sisyphus.
The Gentleman Caller
No need to keep him waiting fifteen anxious minutes; no stately staircase has to frame her entrance.
Cordelia sits quite calmly at the table saucered cup untouched and slowly colding.
Her mind commands a sunny day, with horses she smells the Spring and smiles at mustached men. A storm can rage there now, or suns go setting; white-haired gallants still tip crisp hats and court her.
What matter if those days she lives are twenty-five or fifty years divided?
This day alone will mean most to her heart stout friend through all and keeper of the great loves she has known.
Now he has come, the quietest caller she has yet received. "Madame?" "Oh yes.
I am quite ready. You are right on time."
Cordelia, rising, bids a host of friends adieu whispers gaily, "It was always you."
The Messinger, Finally Arriving
I have been trying to reach him for years:
to tell him to turn right instead of left to choose the blonde instead of the brunette.
Always the barriers
were too strong.
With patience, time and luck
I am closer now than ever.
Again
it is too late.
He is sitting here writing this poem.
I do not interrupt.
Epistle to Persephone

We became accustomed to drought as the farmer does without realizing. Walking through fields of dust he forgets the yields of yesterday; even despair dies.

Unnoticed dust coats his eyes nostrils, throat.

Drought merely is except at times when (as ashes might be searched for some fragment spared by flame) he stoops
to grasp this choking stuff to clasp it tight, to sift it one last time.

This done
he trudges on indifferent to what once meant his greatest joy or pain

until his brow is shattered by a single drop of rain
ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Dale Alan Bailes has published poems and short stories in some two dozen periodicals during his fifteen years as a writer. His poems have been collected in the booklength Cherry Stones (1971) and the chapbook Sharks While Swimming (1974). He has edited seven collections of student poetry from the South Carolina Arts Commission's Poets-In-Schools Program. In 1983 he served as Writer-In-Residence for the SCAC Artists-In-Prisons programs and edited the anthology from that program, I Could Strangle the Wind.

Mr. Bailes holds degrees in English and Media Arts from the University of South Carolina, and completed the Master of Fine Arts degree in Professional Writing at the University of Southern California in 1982.

He has taught English and Scriptwriting at the University of South Carolina and Freshman Composition at the University of Southern California. Currently pursuing his interests in screenwriting, he serves as an adjunct faculty member of the Limestone College Management Science Program and as an English instructor for the Midlands Technical College prison program.