ABSTRACT

This report provides a list, arranged by name and also city, of undertakers in South Carolina. The period covered is primarily the late nineteenth century through the early twentieth century, although some firms date to the mid-nineteenth century and research continues into the mid-twentieth century. Where possible, the lists also indicate whether the firm was African American. While the lists are not presented as authoritative or complete, they do provide an initial resource for those conducting cemetery research in South Carolina. Also included are a few South Carolina firms that were coffin manufacturers, distinct from furniture makers who would prepare a coffin as the need arose.

INTRODUCTION

The history of undertaking in America is rather poorly documented. The “classic” source, Habenstein and Lamers’ (1955) The History of American Funeral Directing is not only dated, but it is also generic and stereotypical. Anyone seeking specific, clear information concerning mortuary practices in a specific region will likely be disappointed. More recent examples of mortuary research include Farrell’s (1980) Inventing the American Way of Death, 1830-1920, and Laderman’s (1996) The Sacred Remains: American Attitudes Toward Death, 1799-1883 (see also Laderman 2003). The only specifically regional study is Crissman’s (1994) Death and Dying in Central Appalachia: Changing Attitudes and Practices.

Even these more recent publications, however, tend to gloss over details in a style reminiscent of Habenstein and Lamers. For example, Laderman explains,

There are no statistical data for the number of bodies embalmed in the early decades of the century, but according to many second and third generation funeral directors, embalming rapidly became a standard feature of the undertaking work performed by their fathers and grandfathers (Laderman 2003:6).

Yet, our research of the McCormick funeral records for a modest metropolitan Southern city do not support this view. Less than two-fifths of the McCormick clientele chose embalming in the first two decades of the twentieth century. While this may be sufficient to demonstrate that it was slowly becoming accepted, it is hardly adequate to suggest that embalming was “rapidly” accepted (Trinkley and Hacker 2004c:10).

Certainly one point that Laderman is correct in, is the realization that we do lack statistical data. For example, the funeral home records for only two undertakers in South Carolina are publicly available. These include our work publishing the early records of J.W. McCormick (Trinkley and Hacker 2004a-c) and the Connelley Funeral Home records (2001). Of these only the McCormick records provide full transcriptions, allowing the statistical study of such topics as coffin prices or prevalence of embalming.

With a history that is so sparsely recorded, a starting point it seems is to better understand the firms that were providing undertaking services. Yet even this is difficult to do since there are few surviving records for early associations. For example, the South Caroliniana Library holds only a single program – dating to 1957 – for the Colored Funeral Directors and Embalmers Association of South Carolina (see, however, Williams 2002). While we make no pretense that this study is complete, we have attempted to examine a range of trade publications, credit reports, and other documents that would provide information on undertaking firms from the late nineteenth century through the mid-twentieth century. The result is an initial starting point for individuals researching changing mortuary patterns, exploring genealogical research, or attempting to better document a cemetery.

The Sources

We have examined a range of mercantile trade publications prepared by several period companies – R.G. Dun (the predecessor of today’s Dun and Bradstreet) and Robert P. Lyon. We have also examined directories of funeral directors, although these generally became population only in the mid to late twentieth century. A number of city directories were examined, especially for Columbia and Charleston. Other resources were incorporated, when identified - although I am certain that a great many others remain to be identified. Again, this document is meant only as an initial effort.

Information Provided

Under name there are both proprietors and firm names. Whatever was available was included; as a result, some firms are well documented with the name of the proprietor and/or manager. In other cases, there is far less information.

Firms that are documented as African American are indicated by "AA." In general, African American firms serviced only African American clients - there was little, if any, cross-over of white clientele. On the other hand, there is some evidence that white firms, historically, provided service to black families. This is clearly shown in the McCormick records (Trinkley 2004b, 2004c). Williams (2002) also recounts a 1984 interview with Clarence Leiby, Sr., founder of the African American Leiby Funeral Home (in 1927), who explained that white firms frequently provided service to blacks, sometimes hiring a black embalmer to do the work. It seems that as more blacks entered the trade, white firms did not aggressively compete for the business - at least not until the end of the twentieth century when blacks once again began crossing over to white establishments.

I have included the city and, where the town has disappeared, the county is included for additional locational assistance. There may, however, be a few situations where the undertaker had multiple offices - not all may be identified.

The type of firm is included when it was clear from the context, discussion, or list. The abbreviations are straight forward: "F & U" means furniture and undertaking and this term is generally found for the earliest undertakers who often were also furniture or cabinet dealers. "Und" identifies those firms that had abandoned furniture and were strictly engaged in mortuary activities. They typically advertised themselves as undertakers, or less commonly as embalmers. "FD" is used to indicate a firm or individual classifying themselves as a funeral director - this term is generally found only in the later periods. While not specifically the subject of this study, I found occasional references to coffin manufacturers and these are indicated as "coffins." Likewise, there were a few firms that specifically produced coffins and furniture ("Coffins & F"), but which gave no indication of engaging in the undertaking business. There are many listings - generally individuals - where it was not possible to identify how they considered themselves - and in these cases the column was left blank.

There is a general

credit situation from 1898 to 1920, revealing that through time, the financial condition of the undertaking profession improved. Nevertheless, those dealing in furniture and undertaking continued to have been credit - likely because of a broader marketing base - than those who focused solely on the undertaking profession.

At a more specific level, these data provide an opportunity to compare the dealings of merchants in large and small communities, as well as compare and contrast perception - repeated by virtually all historical studies - that we see a gradual shift from furniture dealers also providing undertaking services, to specialized undertaking firms, to the refinement of funeral directors. These data, illustrated in Figure 1, bear this out for the South Carolina community.

the operations of white and black undertaking firms.

The "Date" information is self explanatory and simply provides the date for the information concerning that particular undertaker. What should be mentioned is that while some effort was made to seek out early and late dates, as well as multiple dates, the information only indicates that the firm was in business at that particular time. I haven't been able to indicate beginning or ending dates for most firms.

The category of "Notes" provides additional information concerning the firm, where available. And finally, the source is provided for those who desire additional information.

The credit rating information is provided, where available, the various mercantile books consulted. The information isn't provided to represent conclusive data concerning the firm's financial condition, but only as another data source that might otherwise be difficult to find.

The data suggest that while large cities, such as Columbia and Charleston, supported more undertaking firms, a very large number of firms were to be found throughout the state. In 1898, for example, there were 172 firms spread across 113 communities. This is an average of 1.5 firms per city. There were many with only a single firm, such as Trenton with the firm of J.W. Eidson. Trenton forms the lower point of a triangle in Edgefield County with Edgefield to the northwest and Johnson to the northeast. In spite of Edgefield and Johnson being considerably larger, each also had only one undertaker and in those cities the firms were also furniture dealers. In contrast, Columbia, only 50 miles to the northeast of Trenton, supported four firms, although three were supplied furniture. In contrast, Charleston supported 13 undertakers.

This data does, however, provide insights on the development of the profession. Figure 2, for example, looks at the improving

If only the metropolitan area is examined, Columbia in 1900 had a population of 21,208, yielding an undertaker for every 5,300 citizens. Charleston, with a population of 55,807, had a undertaker for every 4,290 citizens.

Summary

Although certainly preliminary or provisional, this list provides the first listing of these firms for researchers. As such it opens many doors, providing assistance to genealogical researchers, as well as suggesting a broad range of economic topics. In addition, it may assist in locating private papers from some of these early undertakers – papers that would be of tremendous importance to mortuary research should they be encountered.
